An English grammar, cataphora is the use of a pronoun or other linguistic unit to refer ahead another word in a sentence (i.e., the referent). Adjective: cataphoric. Also known as anticipatory anaphora, forward anaphora, cataphoric reference, or forward reference. Cataphora and anaphora are the two main types of endophora—that is, reference to an item within the text itself. The word that gets its meaning from a subsequent word or phrase is called a cataphor. The subsequent word or phrase is called the antecedent, referent, or head. Some linguists use anaphora as a generic term for both forward and backward reference. The term forward(s) anaphora is equivalent to cataphora.

In the following examples, cataphors are in italics and their referents are in bold. "Why do we envy him, the bankrupt man?" (John Updike, Hugging the Shore, 1984)a few weeks before he died, my father gave me an old cigar box filled with faded letters." In "The Pendulum Years," his history of the 1960s, Bernard Levin writes of the 'collective insanity which seized America'... (The London Evening Standard, February 17, 1994), quote by Katie Wales in Personal Pronouns in Present-Day English, Cambridge University Press, 1996)"If she were alive today, [Barbara] Bachman would surely be preparing to pen fresh horror pages tonight," as the president seeks to rally his faltering domestic popularity with a series of addressess... (Washington Post, Sunday, October 15, 2000) You see, I'm afraid you're going to have to get used to it. It's like having your own private army. And they'll come back at you every time you turn around. They'll tell you how much more powerful you are than them now. That's why you can't let them know what you're really thinking. If you want to keep them off balance, you've got to make sure they don't know where you stand. So if you ever find yourself talking to one of those bastards, just remember this: you're always right. Always. (Joel Stein, "Crews Control," Time, September 22, 2014)"It must have been taught on your mother, not having any children." (Ginger Rogers in 42nd Street, 1933)"Too scared to buy before they sell," some homeowners aim for a trade. "So I just want to say this to the Congress: An America that buys much more than they sell year in and year out is an America that is facing economic and military disaster. (Congressman James A. Traficant, Congressional Record—House, September 25, 1998)"After she declared herself broken, betrayed, at bay, really low—in another organ yesterday, I'm not sure the Diary should even mention poor Bel Mooney's name." (The Guardian, August 9, 1994) "[Cataphora] is in evidence in the next example, which is typical of the opening sentences of books: Students (not unlike yourselves) compelled to buy paperback copies of his novels—notably the first, Travel Light, though there has lately been some academic interest in his more surreal and 'existential' and perhaps even 'anarchist' second novel, Brother Pig—or encountering some essay from When the Saints in a shiny heavy anthology of mid-century literature costing $12.50, imagine that Henry Bech, like thousands less famous than he, is rich. He is not [John Updike, "Rich in Russia," Bech: A Book, 1970] Here we meet 'copies of his novels' before we know who 'he' is. It only several lines later that the possessive adjective 'his' links forward to the proper nouns Henry Bech in the text that comes after. As you can see, whereas anaphora refers back, cataphora refers forward. Here, it is a stylistic choice, to keep the reader in suspense as to who is being talked about. More usually, the noun that the pronoun links forward to follows soon after." (Joan Cutting, Pragmatics and Discourse: A Resource Book for Students, Routledge, 2002)[Strategic Use of Cataphora "[M]ore often than not, prototypical cataphora is motivated by a planned or strategic delivery of a referent, such as in news-telling like the following: Listen to this—John won a lottery and got a million dollars! Prototypical cataphora thus is also found in advertising copywriting and sales pitches, e.g.: Buy our new product X because Y will happen if you do so. ... This type of cataphora is typically followed by a reason for clarity and more blandly, good style". See H.W. Fowler declare, "...the pronoun should rarely precede its principal.", well echoed by Gowers. There has led to problems in terminology. The term antecedent, for example, is commonly used to refer to a correlative NP in an anaphoric relation; there is no equivalent expression for the postcedent NPs. However, since the latter may occur either immediately preceding or succeeding the antecedent, it seems better to reserve the term antecedent for the former case alone. ... Since the latter occurs almost exclusively in appositional structures, it might be termed appositive antecedence. ... But by an odd semantic license, some grammarians, and of different schools of thought, use antecedent in this sense."
